PANTHER CREEK FALLS, WASHINGTON

Panther Creek Falls is one of the most unique and visually impressive waterfalls I've ever photographed. This hidden gem is unmarked and really off the beaten path, tucked away deep in the Gifford Pinchot National Forest located in southern Washington. Relatively few people know about this picturesque waterfall and even fewer people visit. Anyone wishing to find it will need to Google exact directions.

The waterfall is produced in a unique way. Panther Creek and another small stream, converge at a pair of different level cliffs. It's this rather unique convergence that separates the water and makes this waterfall so esthetically beautiful.

After arriving at this unmarked waterfall, you'll find a well-maintained 500 ft. trail dropping from the road down to a recently constructed platform where the waterfall can be viewed from near the top of the falls. There are many pleasing views right from here.

However, getting to the bottom of the falls where Featured Photograph No. 1 was shot is extremely difficult and a challenge, to say the least. I'd been to Panther Creek Falls twice before on previous trips, but could never make it down the steep slippery slopes and almost cliffs to reach the bottom. This time the so-called trail was dry enough, and with the aid of a rope, I made it. No one else was there and the roaring of the water was almost deafening. I was constantly wiping my lens and camera from the spray. Viewing and photographing this stunningly beautiful waterfall is an experience I won't soon forget, and I think the reward was worth the effort of climbing to the bottom.

Featured Photograph No. 2 of Panther Creek was shot early in the morning on a different day. I was attracted to the way the morning sun crept through the trees at the side of the creek making sunbeams and adding to an already incredibly gorgeous forest scene.
